ETHICAL AND MORAL STRUCTURE OF HUMAN PERSONALITY

The ethical-moral values of man are very important because on these values the human personality is being created. The author Xhemal Balla, in his book “Ethical and moral structure of human personality” has treated many elements of the ethical-moral structure of the human personality such as simplicity, honor, generosity, shame, hypocrisy, prejudice, envy, love, sincerity, kindness, deception, exploration of another’s private life, slander, tolerance, lies, violence.

The lack of virtues and at the same time the presence of vices in the members of the society, are greatly damaging the character of the people, without leaving aside the damage they are causing to the unity of the family.

In this book, 42 articles are included in which are analyzed with great accuracy, almost all the qualities that a person with a full personality or with some vices needs in every aspect of life.

When you finish reading this book, with no doubt you have received full knowledge in almost all aspects of the virtues that a person should have. The author has clearly explain these virtues, on how they can be acquired and which is the most correct way to avoid vices. It is precisely the pious religious who creates the most excellent figure of the person with the most complete virtues.

The aspect of justice is one of the main virtues of man. But in many cases in our country this virtue exists in rare people.

In conclusion we can say that his book is quite useful, certainly for Muslim believers, also for people of monotheistic beliefs but why not also for atheists’ as it shows the right path they should follow in life, especially in these extremely turbulent times.
